INDIGENOUS PEOPLES' DAY IN THE AMERICAS

On April 19, 1940, the First Inter-American Congress of Indian Life was held in Michoacán, Mexico, summoned by the then Mexican President, Lázaro Cárdenas. It was proposed to celebrate Indigenous People's Day in the Americas on this date "in tribute to the first assembly in which the Indigenous took direct intervention in the discussion of their problems," with the aim of perpetuating and highlighting the importance of the native peoples of the Americas, who imprinted the first cultural features of our history on the continent.

Countries of the Pan American Union attended this meeting with representatives of various native tribes and chieftains of indigenous cultures across the continent to analyze their current situation and build a common front. This meeting had as its main objective to find a way to overcome these groups' marginalization. As a result, the Inter-American Indian Institute was created in 1942, which reports to the Organization of American States. The institute's function is to coordinate the indigenous policy on the continent.

nator of the Historical Cartography Committee dependent on the History Commission. This work was the final result of a Technical Assistance Project of the Pan American Institute of Geography and History, also co-sponsored by the Andrés Bello University in Chile.

The axes that make up this Atlas (First Inhabitants, Cultural Shock, Indigenous Development, and Living Culture) show us the continuity between past, present, and the importance of knowing and respecting our Original Peoples who are "a link that represents our motto and identifies us as people of the Americas"
